I. Field of the Invention This invention relates to windshield wiper blades having an improved seal between the blade and wiper arm. In particular, the invention relates to a windshield wiper blade having a structure which improves the seal by coating the inside surface of the wiper arm. II. Description of the Prior Art To improve the convenience and safety of road travel, windshield wipers have been developed which remove most of the debris or water resting on the windshield surface. The well-known "powered" or "self-winding" windshield wipers are generally driven by electric motors. The motor is connected to the windshield wiper arm by an arm drive link. The arm drive link is pivotally connected to the wiper arm and the wiper blade which is attached to the wiper arm. The arm drive link transmits movement from the motor to the wiper blade. A coiled compression spring mounted on the wiper arm applies a resilient force to the wiper arm, causing the wiper blade to pivot and wipe the windshield as the wiper arm reciprocates. If the windshield wiper arm is constructed of rubber, a good connection is generally produced between the wiper blade and the wiper arm. However, some kinds of windshield wiper arms are constructed of metal and do not make as good a connection with the windshield wiper blades. One type of windshield wiper arm is designed to slide on a post mounted on a windshield. The windshield post is generally fabricated of wire mesh which is glued to the windshield. One type of windshield wiper arm has a thin, flexible wire mesh portion or post into which one or more holes are cut. The wiper arm is forced against the windshield, thereby deforming the holes and embedding the edges of the wires b7e8fdf5c8

Outcomes and costs of end-of-life care: a 10-year review. The aim of this study was to examine the outcomes of end-of-life (EOL) care provided by hospital-based palliative care teams (PCTs) in England, and to explore their financial impact on the acute trusts providing the care. A retrospective cohort of all patients who died in a PCT over a 10-year period was studied. Outcomes were ascertained from the official regulatory body, the Care Records. Missing data was addressed by local principal investigators. All costs were adjusted for inflation to 2010 prices. The findings indicate that care was delivered by one of three PCTs and that most patients were aged 75 or over. Half of the patients died in the PCT office or home, while one quarter died in hospital. The majority of PCT deaths were due to cancer. Most patients received some form of palliative care; however, less than one-third had any documented referral to a specialist service at death, and one-fifth were on specialist palliative care. The majority of patients received high doses of pain relief, and most received corticosteroids (92%) and prophylactic antibiotics (61%). The PCT provided the majority of care (96%), while a small number received care from other specialties, including ambulance teams. The majority of patients were cared for by district nurses (49%), followed by a palliative care nurse (38%) and a home care package (4%). This small study suggests that EOL care in the PCT is effective and of benefit to all those receiving it, with most patients receiving high doses of pain relief, corticosteroids and antibiotics. The majority of patients are cared for in the community, with the small proportion of patients in hospital receiving usual care. Furthermore, the costs of care in the PCT are high, but the relatively large number of patients and the limited availability of health and social care services for the elderly make delivery of palliative care in the community a necessity for many hospital patients. Testimonials
