In integrated circuits, different components in an integrated circuit generally communicate to one another using differential signals. A differential signal (e.g., a pair of signals such as Dout and Din) is comprised of a first signal (Dout) that is complementary to a second signal (Din). A differential signal transfers data by the presence or absence of a signal pulse that indicates a data state. Differential signals are typically used because of their ability to cancel voltage noise. However, a differential signal is composed of two components that are offset by 180 degrees in phase. As a result, each differential signal component generally includes some amount of direct current (DC) as well as noise. Therefore, to achieve a clean differential signal, it is often necessary to isolate the components that make up a differential signal. One technique for isolating a differential signal (e.g., a differential signal of a clock signal) is referred to as differential sampling. In differential sampling, a circuit (e.g., a circuit that is known to be clean in the past) is used to isolate a differential signal so that it can be sampled into a data buffer. Noise that is associated with the differential signal is normally filtered out and canceled by the circuit, and as a result, it can be sampled into the data buffer. While differential sampling eliminates the need for an additional circuit that is needed to isolate the differential signal, the differential sampling circuit still
